Human papilloma virus (HPV) is a common sexually transmitted infection that may produce low-grade cervical intraepithelial neoplasia (CIN) in immunocompetent individuals, or high-grade CIN in patients with cervical cancer. In most instances, patients present with cervical disease that does not increase in severity. HPV-related mucosal disease is now known to occur in more than 75% of immunocompetent women with HPV. In approximately one third of women with HPV, no disease is seen. Therefore, HPV appears to be the most important cofactor in the development of high-grade CIN, and possibly cervical cancer. The natural history of HPV infection has been elucidated. In the presence of an immunologic response, the viral infection of the cervix will resolve. After resolution, the viral components become part of the normal glandular epithelium. Most benign cervical condylomas contain HPV DNA, but not RNA. This suggests that these viral DNA are silenced and that these lesions are HPV-resolved infections. The relative lack of HPV DNA in CIN and invasive cancer of the cervix suggests that the HPV DNA is either absent or present in a different configuration. Environmental influences, particularly cofactors, appear to be important in the expression of the full HPV biological state. These include the type of sexual intercourse, and perhaps the use of contraceptive methods. Microbial factors and host cell factors may also be important, but precise etiologic mechanisms are not known. The review explores recent advances in our understanding of HPV and its presentation, including the role of HPV in the development of abnormal cervical epithelium.
